Passage 1

As in business and other professions, the use of computers is a growing trend in health care . At first, computers were used only in the business office for such things as patient billing and paying for purchase. As computer technology advanced, the use of computers broadened to include patient information and communication systems.

Hospital information systems have been developed which collect, send, record, and store information. The information can be retrieved when needed. Patient records and patient care plans are on computer in many health care facilities. Instead of recording on the patient's chart health team members enter information into the computer. Entering information into a computer is observations is also more efficient than writing on the chart. Using the computer to record observations is also more accurate and reliable.

Department such as the X-rays department and the laboratory communicate with other units of the hospital through the computer. Instead of sending a typed report by a person for the patient's record, the information is entered into the computer. The information can be accessed at the computer in the nurses' or doctors' station. The systems have reduced the amount of clerks' work and telephone calls between departments. Information is communicated with greater speed and accuracy.

Computers are also being used to monitor certain measurements such as blood pressure, temperatures, heart rates, and heart functions. The computer is programmed to recognize normal and abnormal measurements. When the abnormal is sensed, an alarm is sounded. Monitoring by the computer has proved to be very accurate and increased early discovery of life-threatening events.

Ask an Icelander who he is, he may be well tell you with a straight face that he Viking. " But the Vikings are long gone, " you may say. He will probably took you off laugh maybe, and tell you that no, they are still here . These days, they just dress different, prefer fishing to fighting, and have much better ships. If there is one thing Icelanders are progress their past. The people of Iceland are indeed direct descendants of Vikings. The island settled by Vikings late in 9ᵗʰ century, and it has had no outside influence since. One reason why Icelanders love their past is that there is plenty to be proud of The Original leaders of wild island were undoubtedly a strong and hardworking group.

In 930AD , a group of men gathered at Thingvellir and founded their own government, which is today the world's oldest parliamentary system. While the rest of Europe was suffering, Leif Eriksson was exploring North America and the great storytellers of Iceland were writing down the epic poems, which are to this day the foundation of Iceland's history. Perhaps the most extraordinary thing about Iceland's past, however , is that it is still alive in the language, which has been unchanged for 1000 years. It is so pure that if you hand an Icelander a copy of saga writing 1000 years ago, he will be able to read every word, And what about the Viking cooking? Well, it's still here, too, and in the month of February you can find it in
